Ethnic Diversity Pushes Right-Wing Citizens to Support Populist Parties

Posted by Lucas Czarnecki • February 20, 2018

"...scholars have focused either on the psychological underpinnings of far-right, populist voting, or on the repercussions of ethnic diversity for social cohesion and societal trust. Only a few studies have, however, considered these two themes in a single design. These rare studies suggest that populist political parties may perform better in areas with high proportions of (ethnic and cultural) minority members... As such, together with Kristof Dhont (Kent University, United Kingdom), our Belgian lab at Ghent University tested a more comprehensive model of the political consequences of diversity, and a manuscript reporting on these tests is currently in press in Social Psychology..."
